Short comment

We live on an area with regular power outages, and limited communications alternatives. Changing the current set up to a "powered" approach would affect our business, school for our children and safety. When power is out, we have no way to make contact with any services. Until there are no black spots for mobile networks, the landline process needs to stay. If you are to introduce a standalone service using Wi-Fi technology, then a standalone powered system needs to be provided to ensure telecommunications are maintained [at no cost to those in those situations].
