

Hello, don't mind if my submission is made public and would enjoy throwing my thoughts in for the changing regulations. Without wasting time and making long-winded and incoherent pile of drivel, I would address a concern I have noticed in a few aspects of life creeping up.

Censorship:

It is, if nothing else, what I wish to see gone forever more than quite possibly anything else. Removal of someones work at the mere offense, however slight, taken by someone else is absolutely disgusting. I am writing this with skeptical thoughts beginning to drown my mind. Governments and Companies seem to almost take joy in the removal of people, ideas and discussions simply for the offense it may cause and with reckless rearguard for the dangerous precedent it could set.

Technology is indeed changing and the ability to overlook seas asking for the right thing to be done and in their place choose a single voice masquerading as one who is rallying for a just cause when secretly (or not so much in some cases) advocating for the opposite can be come common place. Let the artist create and even once an adult is allowed to pick what they see/hear, let them pick freely from uncensored and unfiltered set of creations. If something does not appeal to a large enough group then it might fail so ceasing the ability for a person or people to create something seems like a gross misuse of resources to hasten a process already in motion. Let them fail by their own merit without taking away their voice.