

Dear Australian Classification Board, please stop banning games from being released in Australia. I understand you want to protect the children, but adults should be able to consume whatever they please. Why should you get to dictate what an adult does or does not get to consume? Gaming, like movies and television, is an art form and should be treated as a form of free expression. Do you want to censor free expression? If not then please don't ban games from being released in Australia. The American equivalent of the ACB, called the ESRB, don't ever ban games and instead let stores and consumers decide whether something is tasteful or not by letting stores have the choice between selling the game or not. Why can't we do the same? I would enjoy a proper response to this submission if you can take the time. Yours sincerely Harrison Coper Lamb
